Scharp's research is also nicely described in a December article in Psychology Today, "Study Identified 8 Components of Family Estrangement." Family estrangement is more common than people think, Scharp said in an interview. Indeed, in the New York Times story, one of the myths debunked is that estrangement is rare. But these painful break-ups are rarely discussed openly because of what Scharp describes as a long-held belief in an idealistic definition of family.
